Effects of growth hormone on craniofacial growth.

Quote:

Abstract

OBJECTIVE:
To directly determined the effects of growth hormone (GH) therapy on craniofacial growth in idiopathic growth hormone deficiency (GHD).

MATERIALS AND METHODS:
Fifty-seven patients (23 boys and 34 girls; age range 4.5 to 16.7 years) with GHD were investigated and categorized into three groups according to the duration of GH therapy: the untreated group, the short-term therapy group, and the long-term therapy group. Cephalometric radiographs were obtained, digitized, and craniofacial measurements were assessed by age and sex by using matched standard deviation scores.

RESULTS:
In the untreated group, the anterior cranial base, total facial height, maxillary length, mandibular total length, mandibular body length, and ramus height were smaller than the standard values. In comparison with the short-term therapy group, the long-term therapy group significantly larger upper facial height (P < .05), maxillary height (P < .01), and ramus height (P < .01) measurements.

CONCLUSIONS:
Children who received long-term GH replacement therapy showed increased growth of the craniofacial skeleton, especially the maxilla and ramus. These findings suggest that GH accelerates craniofacial development, which improves occlusion and the facial profile.

So we should take HGH?

Should be enough, if natural limit of GH production were within the bodybuilding world that's not the lifetime of a thieving cat.

I had GH tested as a child and it was in "normal" range. Eh.

testosteron dont change the facial bones just the fat distribution i think.

If you use hgh after your growth is finished only some parts of your body will grow (hands, feets, brownridge, nose, mandibular) but not for example the maxilla.

Symptoms of acromegaly include:
Increased Thickness of the Soft Tissues
Thickening of the Bones of the Face, Hands and Feet
Prognathism of the Lower Jaw
Enlargement of the Tongue
Protrusion of the Upper Jaw
Widening of the Spaces Between the Teeth

@Anabind how can you grow tall but still have tiny hands etc. something i dont understand. both should be affected by hgh

Jens can be watched by people who get acromegaly (very high hgh overdoses over years) post puberty.

Increased Thickness of the Soft Tissues
Thickening of the Bones of the Face, Hands and Feet
Prognathism of the Lower Jaw
Enlargement of the Tongue

Legit

Not necessarily beneficial any more. Childhood is where it's at.

Length of my hands is fine. I can easily grab a basketball without problems and dunk it with one hand. But breadth and width is below average. There's a lot more to it than just growth hormone though.
